tems, projects, and trends that would be of particular interest and value to these readers. Based on the content of previous volumes, one assumes that the main readership of the Annual Review of Pharmacology and Toxicology consists of research scientists who utilize scientific and technical information in pursuit of their scientific endeavors. Consequently, descriptions of only those developments in the scientific and technical information field that would be of interest to these "end users," i.e. the practitioners in toxicology, pharmacology, and allied sciences, have been emphasized.

This chapter, which has been structured according to the sequential stages in the communications structure of science (1), identifies primary, secondary, and tertiary publications and services, and describes certain information storage and delivery systems. Emphasis is placed on delineating online information retrieval systems, since it is in this area that the most rapid developments, holding the greatest promise for the information user, are taking place.

Toxicological Information

In its 1966 report on the handling of toxicological information (hereinafter referred to as the PSAC Report), a panel of the President's Science Advisory Committee defined toxicological information as "all information de-
